

WANTED: REBELS WITH CAUSES.

How is it that standing up for decent work feels like standing on the edge of the economy looking in? Maybe because for too long the world has looked the other way.

That's why we stand with those who fight for decent work.

They see gig work for the loophole that it is. See workers without sick days who have to choose between their health and their pay. And see those trying to make a living on less than a living wage.

The Atkinson Foundation awards the Good Fight Prize on behalf of workers whose voices too often go unheard. If you know people or community groups in the fight for decent work, we want to hear about their campaigns.

Nominate them for the 2025 Good Fight Prize. Not just to put them in the spotlight. But to help us all see what's possible.

Nominations are open until October 27.

IT'S NOT TOO LATE FOR BOB DYLAN TO WRITE A SONG ABOUT YOU.

Yes, the times are always changing. But somehow, workers are stuck singing the same old tune.

That's why we stand with those who fight for decent work.

Who fight for those who have to work two jobs just to pay the rent. Who have no choice but to work, even when they're sick. For those trying to make a living, on less than a living wage.

Nominate them for the 2025 Good Fight Prize. Because if the times are changing, we have the power to change them for the better.

TAKE A STAND. THEN TAKE A BOW.

Sometimes bravery is about holding your ground.
Standing up. Speaking out. Refusing to stay invisible.

That's why we stand with those who fight for decent work.

People who challenge employers that classify workers as "independent contractors" to avoid basic workplace responsibilities. People who point out that having no paid sick days doesn't stop you from getting sick. People who can't stand to watch profits soar while wages stall. People who show up to help close the gap.

The Atkinson Foundation awards the Good Fight Prize on behalf of workers whose voices too often go unheard.

We know you don't do it for the applause. But we recognize and applaud you anyway. Because the more noise we make, the harder we are to ignore.

Join the fight for decent work.

THE DEVIL HAS ENOUGH ADVOCATES.

If it feels like the world's going sideways, you're not alone. And it's not just in the news, it's all around us – especially in our workplaces.

That's why we stand with those who advocate for decent work.

Advocates who expose employers using loopholes to squeeze workers. Intentionally shorting their employees on shifts to avoid the legislative protection of full-time positions. Refusing to pay a living wage, in order to boost profits.

The Atkinson Foundation awards the Good Fight Prize on behalf of workers whose voices too often go unheard. Because we all need advocates in our corner, fighting for decent work.

After all, if you're not advocating for decent work, who exactly are you advocating for?
